1. The 1931 class of inductees will provide the army with a minimum of 150,000 recruits, which exceeds the previous classes. Although not many of the 1927 class are serving in the army as such, they are in uniform, are organized into military units, and receive military pay and rations. They are assigned to building new airfields, reconstructing old ones, building bridges, barracks, etc. The state military building enterprise (Wojskowe Przedsiębiorstwo Budowlane) is in charge of this work.
2. The Polish army has penal detachments (Oddzial Karne) which were introduced by Marshal Rokossovsky. To these detachments are assigned Poles whose political reliability to the regime is in doubt. These include Poles from Silesia and the coastal province of Pomorze whose parents were "volksdeutsch" during the last war; they also include soldiers who allegedly are guilty of conduct unbecoming soldiers, but who in reality are considered politically unreliable. The soldiers in these detachments are used exclusively for hard labor in mines, foundries, road building, fortifications, etc. They are unarmed and work for military pay and rations.
3. There are other brigades, known as "brygady dla niepewnych", to which other types of "unreliables" are assigned. These brigades are composed of soldiers from active service or the reserve who, either during the war years or later, spent some time in the Western countries, including soldiers who served with the Polish army in England, or who correspond with relatives in Western countries. One such special brigade is located in Poznan and housed in the barracks on Dukowski Street. The soldiers in this brigade are armed and under very strict discipline.
